[Intro]

Welcome to this practice. Today we will explore the difference between Doing and Being.

In our daily lives, things often move quickly. We may be busy thinking about what has happened, or busy planning for what comes next. In a rush, it is easy to miss the everyday moments that are full of life. A breath, a sound, a colour, a feeling in our body can carry richness, waiting to be noticed.

We spend most of our time in "doing mode". It can feel like we are on a treadmill. We are moving fast, but we are not really seeing what is around us. We are physically present, but our minds are far away.

The state of "Being" is different. It is an invitation to slow down. It is a chance to soften into the moment. When we shift into "Being," we allow our attention to rest gently on the senses. We simply become aware of what is here.

We become curious about the colors, the shapes, and the textures around us. We notice the sounds and the sensations that make up the present experience. A few moments of paying attention this way can bring a sense of presence that carries into the rest of your day.

[Bridge] Now, we will move into a short practice to explore this.
