[Intro]

Welcome to this practice. Today we will explore Patience.

Consider a gardener planting a seed. The gardener waters the soil and gives it light. But they do not pull on the sprout to make it grow faster. They know that if they force it, they will break it.

Trees do not struggle to grow leaves in the middle of winter; they wait for the warmth of the spring. We cannot hurry the sunrise, and we cannot force a flower to bloom. Everything in nature requires a specific amount of time to unfold.

In the same way, our bodies have their own seasons. Some days we feel open and flexible; other days we feel tight or tired. Patience is the ability to work with the season we are in right now, rather than wishing for a different one.

Growth happens on its own timeline. The season changes when it is ready, not when we demand it. Patience is the willingness to respect this natural pace. It is the wisdom to know that rushing does not help; it only creates tension.

We often treat our bodies like machines that we can force. But the body is like a garden. It opens up when it is ready.

[Bridge] Now, we will move into a short practice to explore this.
