[Intro]

Welcome to this practice. Today we will explore Acceptance.

Acceptance is a word we hear often, but it is easy to misunderstand. We often think it means agreeing with everything, or liking everything. But in this approach, acceptance is simply the opposite of resistance.

Imagine holding a small object in your hand, like a stone. If you squeeze your hand into a tight fist, your muscles get tired. You feel tension moving up your arm. This is what we do when we resist our experience. We tighten up around it.

Now, imagine opening your hand. The stone is still there. You haven't thrown it away. But the tension is gone. The stone has not changed. But your feeling about it has changed. The struggle is gone. Your hand is open, holding the object gently. This is Acceptance.

Acceptance is the willingness to open your hand. It is the willingness to let your experience be there, without squeezing it and without fighting it. When we practice this quality, we stop wasting our energy on resistance. We simply rest with an open awareness, allowing the moment to be exactly as it is.

[Bridge] Now, we will move into a short practice to explore this.
