[Intro]

Welcome to this practice. Today we will explore Letting Go.

We often move through our days carrying a heavy mental load. It is like hiking up a mountain while wearing a heavy backpack. This backpack is filled with rocks. One rock is a worry about the future. Another rock is a regret about the past. Another rock is the pressure to rush and get things done.

We get so used to the weight that we forget we are carrying it. We think the heaviness is just part of who we are. Letting Go is the moment you choose to take the backpack off. You set it down on the side of the trail. You do not have to destroy the backpack; you simply choose not to carry it for a few minutes.

When we let go, we stop carrying the burden of "what comes next." We stop carrying the need to control every outcome. We allow ourselves to walk light. We simply set the heavy backpack down by the side of the trail, allowing ourselves to rest exactly as we are.

[Bridge] Now, we will move into a short practice to explore this.
