[Intro]

Welcome to this practice. Today we will explore Gentleness. Let's start with an image. Imagine you are holding a very small, fragile bird in your cupped hands.

This creature is delicate. If you hold your hands too loosely, the bird might fall, or it might fly away before it is ready. But if you close your hands even a little bit too tightly, you will crush it. To hold the bird safely, you need a very specific kind of effort. You need to be steady enough to provide support, but soft enough to do no harm. You are using your strength to protect, rather than to force.

This balance is the true meaning of Gentleness. This quality changes how we feel. It softens the tension in our shoulders. It slows down our rushing mind. Instead of forcing our way through the moment, we move with a quiet respect for ourselves and the world around us.

In our daily lives, we often rush or push ourselves. We treat our bodies like machines. But we can choose to handle our experience, and ourselves, with the same intentional care we would give to that small bird.

[Bridge] Now, we will move into a short practice to explore this.
